A Letter from Keith

A WOMAN-OWNED
SMALL BUSINESS

In our last Messenger, we looked at how organizational behavior influences every aspect of every organization. We discussed seven levels of values an organization has and how vital a role communication plays. This month we will explore the impact motivation, goals, and decision making have in organizational behavior.

Motivation is the ability to stimulate worker behavior and/or performance in a direction that will increase productivity, profit, and ROI. Motivation comes in many forms and is different for everyone. What may work for one employee will not work for another. Let's look at a few of the most common types of motivators.

What Makes Your Organization Tick? Part 2

Monetary Motivation

Money is an excellent motivator for just about everyone. Most people respond well to getting extra cash for a job well done. There are a few things to remember when using money as motivation. First, pay should be connected to performance benchmarks. Have definite objectives that must be met to receive the bonus. Next, pay rewards must be large enough to drive the work with self-motivation. The employee must feel that it is worth his or her time to put forth the extra effort. Finally, bonuses can be effective to increase performance short-term, but it does not work for the long run. Not only will employees want more money each time, but it will become very expensive. This form of motivation, though highly effective, should only be used occasionally.

Rewards

There are countless rewards besides money that can be used as valuable motivators: vacation time, advancement within the organization, prizes, parties, recognition. The list is endless. In order for a given reward to be effective, you must know what drives your employees. Behavior or performance that is rewarded will be repeated. Rewards focus workers in a positive direction. Rewards must be timed as close to the behavior as possible to gain maximum impact. Most importantly, the reward must be communicated to the employees.

What Makes Your Organization Tick? Part 2

Negative Motivation

One final form of motivation comes through negative reinforcement. Knowing the consequences of poor performance or unmet demands will keep employees moving forward. Since no one likes bad things to happen to them, most people will work hard to make sure they avoid any negative outcome.

Setting goals is important for every organization. However, goals can be a scary concept for some. Many excuses are given for not setting goals, such as:

- Goal setting is hard for our people.
- Goal setting is not realistic for our jobs.
- Goal setting encourages workers to lie and create easy goals.
- Goal setting causes people to sabotage and wrongfully compete.

Organizational success depends on the creation and meeting of goals. No matter what excuse people give, do not let them hinder your organization by lagging behind.

Another daunting task that employees face is making decisions. Again, this is an area where you will hear many excuses. Employees often balk at the prospect of having to make a difficult decision. Listed are some questions to help aide the decision making process:

- Am I willing to take responsibility for solving this problem?
- Have I gathered all the facts possible about this problem?
- What is the root problem?
- Have I surfaced all the possible solutions and conducted an analysis of each?
- What is the best possible solution?
- How well is this solution working long term?

Answering these questions will take off some of the pressure associated with making the decision. Through questions, the employee will know that he or she has covered all the bases and has made the decision based on facts with supporting evidence.

In the next Messenger, we will look at how conflict can be a positive thing in your organization and types of learning.

Truth

In all toil there is profit, but mere talk tends only to poverty. - Proverbs 14:23

Never quit. It is the easiest cop-out in the world. Set a goal and don't quit until you attain it. When you do attain it, set another goal, and don't quit until you reach it.
Never quit. - Bear Bryant

Think of your life as a canoe and your decisions and actions as your paddle. You'll get where you're going one stroke at a time with the decisions and actions you make.
